From Neuro-Oncology Hypothetical Generalized Framework for a New Imaging Endpoint of Therapeutic Activity in Early Phase Clinical Trials in Brain Tumors

Imaging response assessment is a cornerstone of patient care and drug development in oncology. Clinicians/clinical researchers rely on tumor imaging to estimate impact of new treatments, and guide decision making for patients and candidate therapies. This is important in brain cancer, where associations between tumor size/growth and emerging neurological deficits is strong. Accurately measuring impact of a new therapy on tumor growth early in clinical development, where patient numbers are small, would be valuable for decision making regarding late-stage development activation.
