From The Journals

From Neuro-Oncology Advances

Stemness and clinical features in relation to the subventricular zone in diffuse lower-grade glioma; an exploratory study

The subventricular zone (SVZ) of the human brain is a site of adult stem cell proliferation and a microenvironment for neural stem cells (NSCs). It has been suggested that NSCs in the SVZ are potential cells of origin containing driver mutations of glioblastoma, but their role in the origin of diffuse lower-grade gliomas (dLGG) is not much studied. ## Featured Clinical Trial

A Study of Berubicin in Adult Subjects with Recurrent Glioblastoma Multiforme
Berubicin is one of the first anthracyclines that crosses the blood brain barrier. This is an open-label, multicenter, randomized study for patients with GBM after failure of standard first line therapy. Patients are in a 2:1 ratio to receive berubicin or lomustine for the evaluation of overall survival. Read more here.
